Until recently, religion tended to be either neglected in research in international affairs, or perceived as cause or pretext for conflict. This monograph discusses the beneficial potential of the factor ?religion? that should be considered in international relations as well as at the local level. An analysis of literature and interviews with individuals engaged in interfaith activities in the UK have produced first-hand insight into the agendas of the different players in interfaith activities and into the functions of interfaith organisations. These organisations contribute in several ways to the common goal of a more tolerant and less violent society and add value to community regeneration and the neighbourhood renewal programs. The analysis should be especially useful to professionals in the field of peacebuilding and conflict prevention.
