After Zeus hears a rumor that The Twelve Olympians of Greek Mythology are irrelevant in the eyes and hearts of modern mortals, The King of the Gods gathers his council atop Mount Olympus. In a crumbling Council Hall, the Olympians decide the mortals are merely jealous of the gods as they always have been. It is decided that the mortals must be punished and taught their proper place in the hierarchy of the universe—but first things first! Zeus declares a Celebratory Feast to be held tonight to properly honor his—um, rather...the Olympians’—supremacy as rulers. The responsibility of serving a meal suitable for the gods rests at the hands of Zeus’ sisters Hestia and Demeter, while Apollo oversees the performances of his nine Muses of art and dance to delight the Olympians. With little time to prepare, most of the responsibilities fall upon the exhausted Messenger of the Gods, Hermes, to facilitate everything needed for the night’s festivities—including a trip to The Oracle at Delphi and to The Underworld, where he tries to convince Hades—the guy, not the place—to allow Persephone to leave Hades—the place, not the guy—to reunite with her mother, Demeter, and enjoy the night's celebration. The evening is sure to be filled with merriment and reveling, with perhaps a bit of mischief and debauchery mixed in...what could possibly go wrong?
