The Toxic Mismanagement of Freedonia: A satirical commentary exposing the murky fartificatory depths of a blundering and self-absorbed autocratic government bureaucracy. Lucretius Jones

The author was born in an ancient land of deep spiritual significance. A windswept rock bounded by the deep blue sea, crossed by ley lines, and located between two cultures. For two decades, he thrived and toiled within a difficult but loving family. He discovered love, music, travel, and good wine. At 22, he flew the coup and traveled to the antipodean land of Gondwana, where he experienced the natural environment above and below water. The sea has always run through his veins. He lived within the Polynesian culture for over a decade, where he found friends and kinship. At the age of 28 he traveled the world and visited many cultures, and was drawn into environmental conflict. During this time, he experienced arrest by the former KGB, boarded at sea, was run over by a police boat, protested nuclear proliferation, thrown in jail, and deported. He both About the author reveled in life but also suffered deeply. At 35, he lived and worked within the Melanesian culture where he witnessed the brutal killing of a long-lived endangered species due to the actions of a dysfunctional and ethically corrupt western NGO management team. At 38, he moved behind the Redwood curtain where he worked on his education and further developed his skills and experience in matters relating to the environment. At 40 and beyond, he went to work for government, the experience of which was the basis for this story.
